Description (External)

Description - External
Course number and title: PPG200H1 Microeconomics for Policy Analysis (Undergraduate)

Course description: This is a course in microeconomic theory for policy analysis. The objectives of this course are:

(1) To provide you with a foundation in microeconomic analysis and
(2) To demonstrate how this foundation can be applied to design, predict the effects of, and evaluate public policies.

After taking this course, students will be better equipped to understand the main issues on a broad array of topics, from taxation and social insurance policies to welfare and income support programs. For example, this course will provide you with the tools that are necessary to evaluate fundamental questions such as: What are the key factors that determine the shape of the "optimal" income tax schedule? Why should the government provide health and unemployment insurance and what are the benefits and costs of such intervention? What are the efficiency consequences of food stamps vs. cash welfare?

The course will be divided into 4 units: (1) The Market and Consumer Behavior, (2) Producer Behavior (The Theory of the Firm), (3) Market Equilibrium in a Perfectly Competitive Economy, (4) Market Failures and Social Welfare.

Description (External)

Course number and title: PPG2001H S2 Legal Analysis: Policy Migration

Course description: This course focuses on the Canadian policy, law and practice designed to manage and regulate entry, residence and citizenship. The policy answers to the question ‘who gets in?’ will be analyzed in terms of history (who got in to Canada in the past?), global trends (when and why do people want to get in?), comparative examples (who gets in elsewhere?), and critical perspectives (how do class/race/ethnicity/gender affect who gets in?). The course will examine the role of international and constitutional arrangements in determining the role played by different levels of government (United Nations, federal, provincial and municipal) in immigration, as well as the division of labour between the legislator and the executive in making the rules. We will also explore the role of courts both as law interpreters (under the conventional understanding of the judicial role), and as policy makers. We will take into account the contribution of non-governmental actors, such as business, organized labour and civil society in shaping and implementing policy. Although the advancement of economic self-interest is the main driver of Canadian immigration policy, national security, humanitarianism also play important roles. Students will become familiar with the structure of Canadian immigration policy, and the mechanism by which immigration law organizes people into a series of categories and sub-categories: legal/illegal; temporary/permanent; economic/family class; voluntary/coerced etc. Students will also be exposed to the debates, institutional interactions and contingent events that produce specific choices (from a range of options) about how to achieve certain public objectives.

PPG2002H Applied Economics in Public Policy: Public Finance

Course description: This course will look at the major spending programs and revenue-raising tools of Canadian governments: their motivation, design, and intended and unintended consequences. Making extensive use of current materials such as recent government budgets and reports, it will explore the influence of core motivations for government action, such as externalities, information failures and redistribution in modern Canadian economic policies. It will show how policy responds to collisions among priorities and practical problems in such topical areas as healthcare financing, income distribution and pension policy. Economic growth, intergenerational transfers, and the robustness of policies in the face of changing circumstances will be major themes in the course.

Description (External)

Course number and title: PPG2010H Panel Data Methods for Public Policy Analysis

Course description: The course provides a rigorous introduction to statistical methods for the analysis of panel data with specific application to the major Canadian longitudinal data sets. This course is offered in collaboration with the Toronto RDC. The RDC provides secure access to Canada's preeminent panel data sets for public policy analysis as well as a variety of other Statistics Canada data. The course will take place within RDC providing students hands on experience with these important sources of information on public issues. The RDC offers both lecture space and a computer lab for tutorials. While the specific goal of this course is to introduce students to empirical methods for the analysis of longitudinal data, an important by product is their exposure to the RDC data. Instruction includes a combination of lectures and In tutorials, students will complete series of problem sets that provide an introduction to the RDC panel data sets and practice in their analysis. The statistical methods reviewed will be drawn from a variety of disciplines to promote the inter-disciplinary study of public policy. Certain topics of particular relevance to the RDC panel data (e.g., cluster sampling, bootstrapping) will also be covered. The course is intended for a) students from the School of Public Policy and Governance, b) students from departments, schools and faculties where small numbers preclude a similar course being offered, or that desire instruction in the use of data housed in the Toronto Region Statistics Canada Research Data Centre (RDC).

Description (External)

Course number and title:
Sessional Lecturer - 25% FTE PPG2003H Capstone: A Canadian Priorities Agenda

Course description: FTE 25%. This course is intended to draw on the skills, analytic approaches, and policy knowledge that students have acquired over the course of the MPP program and to bring them to bear on the development of a coherent policy agenda for the current Canadian context. The course is modelled after the Institute for Research and Public Policy’s Canadian Priorities Agenda (CPA) project, updated to account for the dramatic shifts in the policy environment since the original CPA exercise in 2007. The CPA brought together a group of “agenda-setters” to set priority areas for action, researchers who made proposals for particular policies within each priority area, and a panel of “judges” who recommended new policy agendas for Canada by choosing from among the proposals presented. In this course, the student will act as all three—agenda setters, proponents and judges—in developing and defending an agenda of three policies for their final course assignment. By the end of the course, it is expected students will be able to balance and articulate the political, economic, social, fiscal, and intergovernmental needs and constraints of policymaking in Canada. Additionally, it is expected that by the end of the course students will be able to moderate the complexities of policymaking to address the question: what mix of policy options will most improve the social and economic wellbeing of Canadians?

PPG2013H Topics in Public Policy I: Regulatory Governance

Course description:
Jurisdictions throughout the world have been seeking to expand the role of renewable energy for their energy systems. Renewable power is a zero emissions source of energy but it is also intermittent and not responsive to price changes. It is also more capital intensive and capital expensive than fossil fuel generation.
This course will examine the experience in Ontario, Europe and the United States in increasing the role of renewable power as well as the plans to do so in Alberta. Specific issues to be addressed include:
• The federal and provincial legal frameworks for energy supply;
• Intuitional governance in energy regulation;
• The role of different technologies in energy systems;
• The way in which renewable power contributes to meeting reliability and flexibility requirements;
• The challenges posed by renewable power to electricity markets;
• The rise of distributed generation; and
• Successes and failures in renewable power policy and procurement.

PPG2001H Legal Analysis: TBA

Course description: Energy policy lies at the centre of economic development, environmental sustainability, First Nations reconciliation and retail politics. It is complex and difficult. Ontario’s current energy policy structure was implemented in the early 2000s. It was based on a belief in markets and regulatory independence. This was consistent with, and drew ideas from reforms in Europe and the United states. Although, in practice, Ontario policy was inconsistent with its founding ideas, there has not been a fundamental reconsideration of these premises.
This course will examine the history and ideas informing energy policy in Ontario and other jurisdictions for the purpose of exploring new ways to conceive of and manage the challenges of regulating energy.

Description (External)

Course number and title:
Sessional Lecturer - 25% FTE PPG2003H Capstone: A Canadian Priorities Agenda

Course description: FTE 25%. This course is intended to draw on the skills, analytic approaches, and policy knowledge that students have acquired over the course of the MPP program and to bring them to bear on the development of a coherent policy agenda for the current Canadian context. The course is modelled after the Institute for Research and Public Policy’s Canadian Priorities Agenda (CPA) project, updated to account for the dramatic shifts in the policy environment since the original CPA exercise in 2007. The CPA brought together a group of “agenda-setters” to set...
Priority areas for action, researchers who made proposals for particular policies within each priority area, and a panel of "judges" who recommended new policy agendas for Canada by choosing from among the proposals presented. In this course, the student will act as all three—agenda setters, proponents and judges—in developing and defending an agenda of three policies for their final course assignment. By the end of the course, it is expected students will be able to balance and articulate the political, economic, social, fiscal, and intergovernmental needs and constraints of policymaking in Canada. Additionally, it is expected that by the end of the course students will be able to moderate the complexities of policymaking to address the question: what mix of policy options will most improve the social and economic wellbeing of Canadians?
